

In processes.c , incrementing x values in one processes doesn't affect the value of x in the other process . So only the child process prints x as 7 while parent prints x as 2 .

In threads.c , x is globally available to both threads so increasing the value of x in one causes the other thread's x to be incremented by the same amount . So both print x as 7 .